CRANBERRY NOTES.

By Prof. Fox, continued.

I am unable, of course, to present here a summary of the year's work, but I take pleasure in making a brief statement of some of the results of the observations made in the field in the previous years, and especially in the year of 1906.

It is acknowledged by all growers that the greatest enemy to the cranberry crop in the state of Wisconsin is frost. There are other meteorological conditions which seriously affect the crop, such as floods, hail storms, droughts, extreme heat and abnormal cold, but the most necessary down to the frost point. The eastern cranberry growing sections of Cape Cod and New Jersey are just as likely to be visited with floods, droughts and hailstorms as the Wisconsin marshes, and especially in this so in the case of New Jersey, but low temperature conditions, as a rule, affect only the cranberry crop and there is not as much need of water protection and, in fact, the frost majority of the bogs of Massachusetts are "dry bogs" as called, about 70 per cent only having water supply for refilling, while about 30 per cent of the New Jersey bogs can be refilled. The great majority of the bogs in Wisconsin are provided with ample means for refilling in anticipation of frost, and it is only during a year in this state in which the temperature conditions are unusually favorable that the grower, without means of protection from frost, can hope to gather even a fair crop. Dampening frosts invariably occur in those bogs in the month of May, often in June, occasionally in the middle months of July and August, and usually again in September, while midsummer frosts are practically unknown in the east, and very rarely occur in the month of June. A comparison of the temperature readings near the surface in the bogs of Cape Cod, New Jersey and Wisconsin, is not possible through lack of proper observations in the east, but minimum temperature readings on hard land at Plymouth, Mass., and Whitcomb, N. J. in the midst of the eastern cranberry districts, have been compared for the months of May and September of 1906, with similar readings at Mather, Wis. In May, the minimum temperature at Plymouth, Mass., averaged 4.1 degrees higher than at Mather and 4.5 degrees in September, while at Whitcomb, N. J., the temperature averaged 2.1 degrees higher in May and 7.6 degrees in September than at Mather. In fact the three frost which occurred at Whitcomb, N. J., was a heavy one on Oct. 8, while there was a heavy one on Oct. 11, two to three weeks later than a similar frost in Wisconsin as usual.

The work carried on here at the Experiment station under the direction of Prof. Whitcomb, the results of which have been published shows that the minimum temperature is higher on well drained, thin soil and sandy bogs and the observations of the weather bureau confirm the results of Prof. Whitcomb's work. The conditions here at the Experiment station were, of course, specially created and are to a certain extent artificial and represent conditions not actually found in marshes in operation, while the weather bureau has taken observations in typical marshes preserving the original conditions as far as possible.

The coldest points on the marshes at Mather and Cranmoor were found over the moss while at the Pith marsh, near Berlin practically no moss exists, the lowest temperature there being found at a point called "the ferns" where there was a rank growth of vegetation including grass and ferns as well as vines. The average difference between the coldest points on these three marshes during the season of 1906 was something less than 1 degree, although there were great differences on individual dates, chiefly on account of variation in nocturnal cloudiness and wind movement. Over newly sanded surfaces in these marshes, the minimum temperature averaged about 5 degrees greater than at the coldest points, the difference being greater however at Cranmoor.

Our observations show that the temperature at an elevation of 4 ft. is higher than near the surface over peat soil, but very much the same in sanded sections. An increase in temperature from the surface to the height of 4 ft. has been found by me not to be gradual, but on the contrary over various soils the temperature falls rather than rises during the first 3, 4 and 5 inches, but the change is less over moss than other soils. At Berlin the minimum temperature averages on the newly sanded and thinly vined section over four degrees lower at the surface and a difference of 5.5 degrees was observed on Oct. 1, 1906 between two thermometers at this point. The morning clear and cool with heavy frost on this morning, the top berries were frozen hard, while those close to the ground were unharmed. This condition explains in an additional advantage the Cape Cod growers have over the Wisconsin growers. Aside from the Massachusetts bogs being kept well sanded and clean, the vines are short and the uprights usually less than three inches in height the berries being low down and lying very close to the ground, thus avoiding the lowest temperatures then proximity to the warmer soil.

Local officers report that we are having an epidemic of tramps just at present, and there is not a day passes that several hordes are rounded up and helped out of town with a little friendly advice. It is stated that the unusual number of hordes in this section is caused by the fact that men are very scarce in the city and shipping out any kind of a man that will accept transportation, the outcome of the matter being that many tramps are placed up in the cities and given the promise that they will go to work, but after they arrive at their destination they soon find of manual labor and start to drift back to the large cities. The consequence is that there is a continuous stream of this class of people going to the outskirts of civilization on the passenger trains and another stream coming back.
